I take this opportunity to congratulate Military Review, The Professional Journal of the U.S. Army, on its 100th anniversary and to express both admiration and appreciation for the continuing legacy of high standards in security research, analysis, and critical thinking.

From its establishment in the immediate aftermath of World War I, Military Review has served as a forum for article-length discussion and debate on issues relevant to each era of the Army's evolution since the early 1920's. Consequently, its pages provide to researchers a collection of articles covering a variety of topics relevant to conflict, some peculiar to the circumstances of their time, and others entirely relevant to the present.

In the current complex and uncertain operating environment, Military Review remains an important venue supporting the Combined Arms Center in its effort to broaden the understanding and discussion of issues vital to the Army and national defense overall. Further, I am confident that Military Review will expand the influence of the Army University as it continues to play a role in seeking out and publishing cutting edge material that stimulates research, critical thinking, and productive debate through the next century.
